SE BACK FOR HAINS DEFENSE

State Scores Strong Point in Testimony of Witness Who Describes Shots.

FLUORINE, L. I., Dec. 18.—The defense in the trial of Thornton John Hains, accused of participating in the murder of William E. Anus, offered a last blow today. Its chief contention, that he drew his revolver only in protest, he learned from assault, and only after the captain had emptied his automatic revolver into the body of Anus, was contradicted and refuted in a most dramatic manner by Herbert S. L. Parker, an eye witness to the shooting.

Parker was a wonderful witness for the defense. His story came as a climax to what had been a series of rather unimpressive testimony. The early hours of the day had been devoted to the testimony of Frederick Brown, one of yesterday's witnesses. The drawing rain and sleet outside and the gloomy atmosphere seemed to affect all, and there was a feeling about the ground that which was most depressing. Parker's story, however, was a revelation. He described the shooting in such a way that the jury could not but be convinced that there was a shooting, precipitation, however, that four men and their mother-in-law were the only shot.

Missing Witness Found.
The fact that a witness at the prosecution of the defense that the shooting by Captain Hains was done on impulse, without, and that he emptied his pistol into Anus, both with the single purpose of the dance on the summer evening of the night.

During the morning a story was told by Parker, that the shooting was done by Hains, and that he emptied his pistol into Anus, both with the single purpose of the dance on the summer evening of the night. The Girl with a Hundred Selves

My Self That Loved a Farmer Lad

HAVE you ever seen a girl who has a hundred selves? I have. I have seen a girl who is a perfect angel in the eyes of her friends, but who is a perfect devil in the eyes of her enemies. A Man's Views on Flirting--By Dorothy Dix

ONE of the learned professors of Northwestern University, in a recent lecture on the subject of flirting, has laid down the following rules for a guide to a young man:

Do not seek the attentions of young men. Never notice young men who look at you from the corner of their eyes. Do not stroll on the campus with more than one escort.

Do not employ little devices to attract young men. A man of real worth will seek you for yourself alone. Do not encourage the attentions of too many young men. Such conduct cheapens a woman.

What Men Think--and Does. When a man thinks about a girl, he is not thinking about her as a person, but as a woman. He is not thinking about her as a person, but as a woman. He is not thinking about her as a person, but as a woman.

HAVE you ever been jealous? But that is a foolish question. Of course, you have for every woman who has known the maddening sting of jealousy at some time in her life. That Russian
Burned Up
His Money

And He Burned Up NOTHING
AT ALL

Copyright, 1908, by American Journal Company

labor, because—say the geese—without capital you could not employ labor.

Of course, even the hindmost feather on the "pope's nose" of a goose ought to know that money is nothing but the products of man's energy, the TOKEN of that energy. Humanity, the products of the earth, labor and intelligence combined are the only wealth. Money is nothing.

A recent story proves this. A Russian, very rich, knew that his money was dying. He had all of his wealth transformed into bank notes, paper money. In a furnace in his room he burned up all of that paper money. He called his relatives together; then—imagine their rage—pointed to the ashes, and said: "There lies all my wealth. I did this that you might not be bothered by my worries and jealousies."

As a matter of fact, what did that Russian burn up? NOTHING AT ALL. He didn't take any wealth out of the world or burn any. Every real thing he ever had is still in Russia. If he owned a house, and changed it into paper money, THE HOUSE IS THERE. If he owned horses, land, factories, pictures, furniture, and changed them into paper money, THE PROPERTY IS STILL ALL THERE.

If he owned human beings, working nominally as free men, but really as wage slaves chained up in his factories or on his estates, and sold them with the property for paper money, THEY ARE STILL THERE.

That man burned up nothing but empty tokens. It is true that he destroyed the little token by means of which he might have proved that his heirs owned the real property. But all the real property still exists in Russia.

It would have been a different story if he had organized a brutal war and killed off those slave peasants. Then he WOULD have destroyed property. It would have been different if he had gathered his relatives together and burned up thousands of bushels of wheat, valuable pictures, furniture, houses, the product of the labor of men. Then, indeed, he would have destroyed PROPERTY.

But he burned simply MONEY, capital, the empty, meaningless and, in itself, VALUELESS token by which labor crystallized and possessed by one enables that one to exploit or enrich others.

Lucky it is for the human race that money means so little really; that money burned up by fire, literally, as this Russian burned it, or money burned by human folly, doesn't mean that the human race is greatly impoverished. All the paper money that that Russian burned was probably worth less than a dollar for the paper and ink. Then Russia to-day is poorer only by less than one dollar—not poorer by millions of roubles.

The foolish spendthrift who inherits the millions of a father, and burns up those millions in the usual American way, is fortunately not burning up PROPERTY. He is simply burning up his own stupid, harmful folly to control other men; and, since he is a fool, how fortunate it is he can burn up his own stupidity right WITHOUT HURTING OTHERS.

He gambles it, he scatters it, he cunningly forces it; he destroys no REAL value. That is why the world is able to go on in the face of all the folly, the self-indulgence, extravagance of the hair-brained mongrels whom our millionaires leave behind them. Real wealth in its highest form is HUMAN THOUGHT; that is the power of controlling force and matter to which we owe everything, all the real wealth, happiness and knowledge.

Then there is the intelligent LABOR of man; that is wealth, indeed when directed by mind. And as a foundation there is the beautiful earth, the heritage of the whole human race, given to the race by generous Nature, AND NEVER TO BE TAKEN AWAY FROM THE RACE.

That wealth, plus man's intelligence and labor, is the ONLY wealth. A dozen men in history have claimed all of it—Alexander, Caesar, Attila, Napoleon. And now the bones of each rot to dust in some little earth-corner. AND STILL THE EARTH AND THE WEALTH BELONG TO THE HUMAN RACE.

Our Alexanders and Attilas of to-day claim this section of the earth that mass of railroads, this source of wealth, as their own. But soon, too, each of them will rot in his little corner of the earth—six feet for him, and no more—and the earth and the wealth will belong to the human race, to whom creative power gave them.

A Christmas Warning

By James J. Montague

How little little! so you've grown so very wise. You read the tales of Santa Claus with doubting, scornful eyes! For every, very little boy who thinks that tale will do. But what must he be thinking of to palm it off on you? Well, doubt away, my little man; but, maybe, pretty soon Old Santa Claus will come along beneath the Winter moon. And, drawing up before your door, will phone inside and say: "Aha! He don't believe in me. I guess I'll drive away!"

AND then with nose all flattened out against the window pane. You'll watch his shadowy palping, with all their night and morn. Away off yonder toward the roof of other little boys. The sleigh piled high with every sort of brand-new Christmas toys. And maybe then you won't regret, that, not so long ago—To point of fact, a week or two—you said he wasn't so. And maybe then you will not wish that you had never read The books that warned the little in you, and left your faith all dead!

AWAY in where the Northern Lights edge round the Wintry sky, Old Santa Claus is waiting up the hours that go by. The ruddy wings impatient feet, all ready to be off. And glad the hours of little boys that do not come and seek; And Santa Claus secretly sighs and says "If all of them were here, I'd be so glad to see them!"

The warnings of the children who still hold their faith in me; But, for those who don't believe, There will be no Christmas Eve.

They know so much about the world they have no need of me!

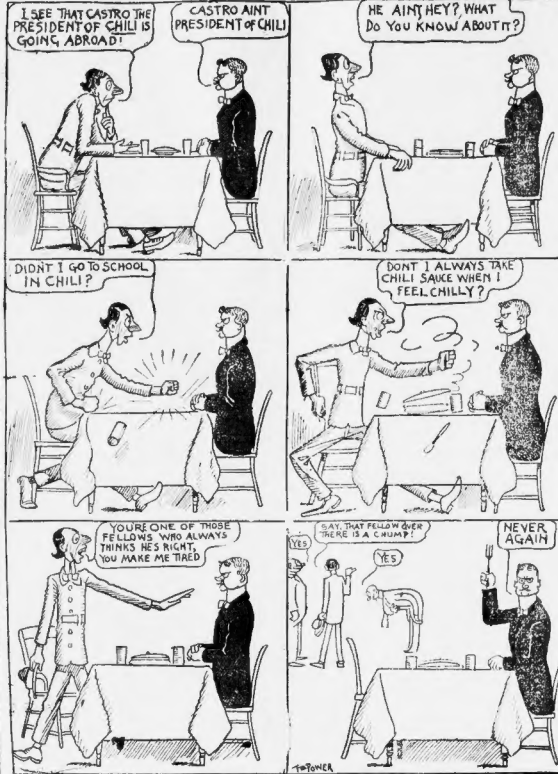

James J. Montague's verse appears regularly in the BOSTON SUNDAY AMERICAN. It is one of the best of famous writers who contribute to the Editorial Section of our Sunday AMERICAN.

LETTERS FROM AMERICAN READERS

GET UP DANGER SIGNALS
TO THE BOSTON AMERICAN.
I read in your paper of December 5 an article on "The Cure for Divorce," by Dorothy Dix. I wish to say right here that that article is a lie, and I do believe I am in a position to know something of the reason a divorce is given, for who can know the reason better than one that has passed through the experience?
I would say, it's the nation's duty to put up danger signals. For can there be a more dangerous thing than a woman's making a divorce a mere business transaction, and then the law to say one hand to one man and the other to another man?
"A DIVORCED MAN."

The Woman Who Is Never Pleased

By ELLA WHEELER WILCOX

Copyright, 1908, by American Journal Company

THERE was a woman who prided herself upon her virtues. She was the soul of honesty; she paid her debts promptly, and never allowed a borrowed postage stamp, even to be charged against her in the memory of a friend.
She was economical and thrifty; she saved, and managed, and helped her husband to grow in fortune.
She was neat and orderly, and kept the house like a jewel box.
She was chaste and virtuous, and no breath of gossip ever blurred her good name.
She was unselfish in her impulses to aid the needy, and to work for the poor and unfortunate.
Her neighbors called her "an excellent woman."

Planned Surprises
Every in the married life of this couple the husband had been inclined to bring about little surprises, or planned surprises, but never came off in a way that was really surprising his wife.

If he brought her a ring, she expressed her regret that it was not a diamond; if he brought her a watch, she wished it had been a chain; when the clock struck, it was too long or too short, it was the wrong time.

The fault grew upon her in such a way that the husband ceased trying to surprise her. He attended her in such a way that she never felt that he was not doing his best.

But whenever he attempted to surprise her, she would say: "It was too long or too short, it was the wrong time." Even a son of gold could not escape her criticism. It was his fault that he was not a son of gold, and when he was a son of gold, he was not a son of gold.

Nothing Satisfied Her
Purchases made in the most expensive stores were returned and exchanged for others, almost invariably.

The husband was urged to replace the returned and exchanged items, and when he did so, she would say: "It was too long or too short, it was the wrong time."

Always was this woman filled with complaints and criticisms. After she had selected and paid for a set of furniture, or a carpet, she was displeased with it.

ELLA WHEELER WILCOX.

the result, which was due, she thought, to her failure in the selection, and even after she completed all her shopping, she was not satisfied with the result.

Her husband's virtues and her own virtues were the cause of her dissatisfaction. She was never satisfied with the result of her shopping.

Alienated a Husband

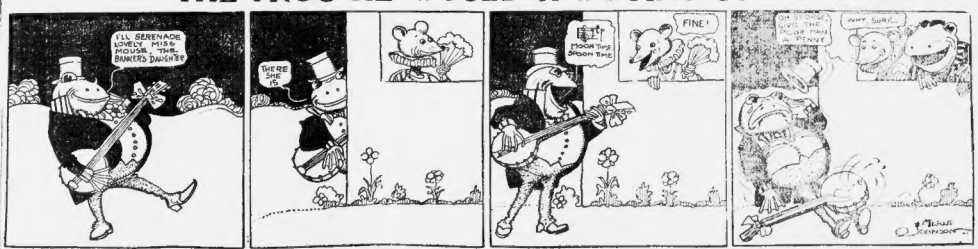

And so, after many years of life with this woman, who was so good in all her virtues, and so good in all her virtues, and so good in all her virtues, she was alienated from her husband.

And so, after many years of life with this woman, who was so good in all her virtues, and so good in all her virtues, and so good in all her virtues, she was alienated from her husband.
